Russian MP and retired general Vladimir Shamanov has delivered a blunt response to EU foreign policy chief Kaja Kallas over her call to obtain Russian military personnel data for sanctions purposes.

Kallas suggested that European intelligence agencies could steal the information to identify Russians who have participated in the Ukraine conflict.

*"Let her sort out her own sh*t first,"* Shamanov said in a video published by Russian broadcaster Radio Mayak on Telegram on Tuesday.

Kallas made the controversial suggestion following a meeting of EU foreign ministers in Brussels the day before while discussing the bloc's upcoming 22nd package of sanctions against Moscow. The new measures could include an entry ban targeting Russians who have participated in the Ukraine conflict.

Asked how Brussels intended to identify those individuals, Kallas pointed to the bloc's intelligence capabilities, saying it had some "very good intelligence people" and that obtaining Russian military personnel records would be "quite easy."

Her comments came less than a week after the German parliament approved sweeping intelligence reforms authorizing offensive cyber operations abroad, among other expanded powers.

The proposal has drawn an angry response from Moscow. State Duma Speaker Vyacheslav Volodin accused Kallas of openly advocating the theft of Russian service members' personal data, warning that such actions could carry a prison sentence of up to 20 years under Russian law.

Another Russian MP and retired general, Leonid Ivlev, called for Interpol officers to visit Kallas' Brussels office, "preferably with handcuffs." He accused the EU of abandoning the very legal principles it once championed.

Russia's permanent mission to the EU also condemned the proposal, questioning whether efforts to obtain military records would comply with the bloc's own privacy laws.

If the EU has such a reservoir of intelligence, perhaps she should ask for a loaner dose for herself.
