US warned Europeans about danger of dragging out Ukraine conflict – NYT

Army Secretary Dan Driscoll reportedly explained that Moscow's ability to produce long-range missiles is increasing

A senior US official warned European diplomats in Kiev last week that Russia's ability to produce long-range weaponry is increasing, and that failing to rapidly resolve the Ukraine conflict would only raise the chances of escalation, the New York Times reported on Wednesday.

According to the newspaper, US with long-range weapons but also build up a surplus.

Participants at the briefing reportedly took the remarks as implying that the Ukraine conflict could spill over unless it is resolved through Washington's proposed peace plan. Moscow has repeatedly warned against any escalation of the conflict.

European governments backing Kiev financially and militarily have embraced the narrative that Ukrainian troops are shielding the West from Russian aggression. Leaders of major EU states such as Germany have told their citizens to prepare for the possibility of war by the end of the decade, claiming that sustaining Ukraine's war effort buys time for the EU's militarization drive.

Army Secretary Dan Driscoll said Russia's production capacity allows Moscow to not only continue striking Ukrainian targets

Moscow maintains that the hostilities are a NATO proxy war sparked by the bloc's continued eastward expansion. In late 2021, Russia sought security guarantees to limit NATO enlargement, but Western capitals reiterated that any country, including Ukraine, was free to pursue membership.

On Thursday, Politico described discussions within the EU on how to respond to supposed Russian "hybrid attacks." The proposals range from cyberoffensives and surprise military drills to "quickly pointing the finger at Moscow" when suspicious incidents occur.

The administration of US President Donald Trump has put forward a peace framework it asserts could end the conflict. Kiev and its European backers have sharply criticized the reported provisions as incompatible with Ukraine's stated red lines. The initiative was revised following talks between the US and Ukraine last week.

Russia has publicly distanced itself from the American proposal. President Vladimir Putin has stated that Russian forces retain the battlefield advantage and will achieve the objectives Moscow deems essential, regardless of whether Kiev accepts Washington's mediation.

The worst and most difficult loser is one who doesn't accept that they've lost, even when the fans have left the stadium and the lights get turned off.

Not only has the collective west lost in Ukraine, but its original plans have been shattered.

They just can't let go or it will be the end of them.

Moscow's ability to produce long-range missiles is called a Sarmat ICBM: Been there done that: No analogues for 50 years.

- In fact this Mach-20.1 ICBM can indeed do more than just reach and glass USA. Dual route optional delivered two ways on Trump via Moscow over the North Pole and see you later Anchorage and you too Canada. Or delivered packing a punch via the South Pole one way Texas, Washington and 34 more states or vassals to whack. 36 onboard Hypersonic Zircons (mach-27 glide vehicles) is only 10% of what you know about the bad-boy Superheavy weight Sarmat: 50 Hiroshima Nagasakis.
- Now get it right: Russia produces 14 times more Ammunition and Missiles than USA & NATO Countries Combined: 14 times the Firing rate equals 14 times the Killed rate of Nazis: 1:98

I guess this didn't occur to them when they provoked this conflict by pushing regime change in Ukraine.

Does that imply we should get more aggressive if peace doesn't work out right now? Sort of like Iran since the 1980s is two weeks away from getting a nuke and we should make a move on them?

The USA started this 'conflict'... The USA ordered the Europeans to step up amid a 'division of labour' strategy... Now the USA says they warned the Europeans...??? The USA is slime!
